Passage I

On a night in May During World War II, one of the finest battleships ever built—the Bismarck—put out to sea to fight the British. Britain's largest battle cruiser, the Hood, and one of her best battleships, the Prince of Wales gave battle.

The Bismarck's second salvo injured the Prince of Wales, which dropped out of the running fight. The third salvo broke the Hood in two, and while the two halves sank, officers and men of the Bismarck cheered and sang and danced on deck. The "unsinkable" Bismarck sailed on, looking for new conquests.

Then one morning the men on the Bismarck learned that the hunter was being hunted. An American-made seaplane appeared through an opening in the clouds. After that wherever the Bismarck went, eyes were watching from the sky.

Next day a flight of British Swordfish planes came roaring out of the clouds. One of their torpedoes explodes against the side of the Bismarck. That night the planes sent three more torpedoes crashing against the ship. One damaged the rudder, causing the ship to travel in circles. About midnight, as the Bismarck circles, a pack of British destroyers surrounded the battleship, sending more torpedoes into her.

In the morning the battleships Rodney and George V arrived and began pounding the wounded Bismarck with their great 16-inch guns at a distance of eleven miles, and then moved in closer and closer, until the range was only two miles. The Bismarck fought back. She seems unsinkable and her men would not surrender. Never before had a ship taken such punishment and remained afloat. At last, her flag still flying, the bow went up, the stern went down, and the pride of the German navy slid under the waves, taking her crew with her.

Passage II

Three men stood drinking at a bar near a railway station. They were waiting for a train and had, therefore, asked the railway porter to inform them when the train arrived. A short time later the porter appeared in the door way of the bar to tell them that the train was just coming in.

"Ah!" said the men. "We have time for just one more drink." They then all took another drink and ran out, but they missed the train. Again they went back to the bar in order to await the arrival of the next train. They continued drinking. An hour later the second train arrived and the same thing happened. They missed the train again in the same way.

Passage III

Christmas is a very important holiday. Many people make Christmas plans weeks or months ahead of time, and they look forward to the day all year round. However, Christmas in 2004 wasn’t the happiest. Those watching the news on TV would have some big headlines that read: “Earthquake”, “Tsunami”, and “Hell on Earth”. The number of reported dead climbed by the thousands and is currently at over 150,000 and still rising. There had been huge front pages spread in newspapers that look like the aftermath of the apocalypse. Even though we are in Taiwan and far from the devastation, it is hard not to feel shocked and unsafe.

The Taiwanese media tends to play up the sentimental value of news stories, but this sort of maudlin display has already inundated people with a feeling of numbness toward what they watch. However, seeing the images of this disaster truly makes people contemplate the reality they live in. The world was shaken overnight, and it felt like people were all experiencing the loss of someone close to them, and they have got together in mourning. Those sitting in front of TV all have an earnest desire to help in some way, and the international community has once again forged a feeling of unity, and has outpoured its love and concern for the victims of the tragedy.

The Pope has urged people to extend a helping hand, and many international organizations are already supplying aid. Taiwan has also responded immediately to the situation by sending out search parties, and plans to send medical supplies and organize charitable events are in the works.
